

Ellen is fighting a life threatening cancer

Happy, easy-going Ellen, who's always making everyone laugh, was diagnosed with high-risk neuroblastoma – a very aggressive childhood cancer - when she was only 2 years old. Sadly, she is having to go through an incredibly intensive treatment regime to help her fight the disease. Her family are fundraising with Solving Kids' Cancer because there is a possibility that she will need treatment in the future that is not available through the NHS, which could cost hundreds of thousands of pounds.

Funds raised will go towards helping Ellen and her family or to support other children and families affected by neuroblastoma.

For children with high risk neuroblastoma, like Ellen, the survival rate is much lower than other childhood cancers. Upon relapse, this rate reduces even further. 60% of children with cancer access clinical trials because standard treatment options are limited; potentially curative or life prolonging clinical trial options exist at home and abroad.
